The river fall another seven inches, fifteen inches in the forty-eight hours. The markets generally reported dull, weak or irregular. On account of the break nother occasions at the fallure of no less than six cotton were received from Liverpool. Tidings of the fallure of no less than six cotton wills "at one fell swoop," cast a heavy gloom on the cotton market. The New York Bulletin, of Wednesday, reports:

York Bulletin, of Wednesday, reports:

The market was the fallure of th tendency was in favor of buyers. The eign accounts, both public and private, were somewhat better, but not of a nature to stimulate purchases for export, and we could learn of no attention given by shippers to table cottons, even on the better selections. On home account there was about a fair average call, but spinners still displayed the old cautious and indifferent tone. For future delivery the market has been fairly active, a little excited and somewhat buoyant, for the greater portion of the day's business. The stimulating influences are not of a very decided character, but operators appear to find a base for improvement in the stronger tenor of the Liverpool advices, the reports of the south and the rather over-sold condition of the market. The desire to cover is certainly very marked in many quarters, and though the call seems to be met, and the upward turn resisted, the 'buile' have been enabled to show the greatest advantage for the past few days." Quotations at the Memphis cotton exchange were as follows:
